The Board of Pensions (and the IRS) require Non-Accountable Allowances be treated as ordinary income. For example, if an annual auto allowance of $3,600 is paid in direct payments of $300 per month without requiring documentation of actual mileage or expenses, it is considered income and subject to pension dues (and taxes). If auto expenses are reimbursed on the basis of vouchered mileage reports and are paid up to 56 cents per mile, those payments are not treated as income by either the IRS or the Board of Pensions. The same for other professional expense allowances. Note: The IRS does not allow reimbursement (as an employee business expense) for miles driven from one's residence to their place of employment (commuter miles).
